

A crazy quilt of blankets covers Sundance lawn as sweater-clad music lovers take in concert.

green with pine and aspen, with a clear blue sky above.

Redford, wearing a white sports coat and pants and open-collar shirt, chatted with musicians before he took the stage to welcome the 2,000 concert-goers to a Sundance "first."

Calling the area "simply the most beautiful place I've ever seen," Redford said, "the thing most comparable to the natural beauty of the place is the arts." He told the crowd he wants to develop Sundance into a place that will "enhance the soul," noting the successes of the Sundance Film Institute, summer theater and the recently completed playwright's conference, plus the signing of Ballet West to be in residence at the resort next summer.

"I can't think of any better way to celebrate a place as beautiful as this than with music," Redford said. Then he turned the program over to associate conductor Charles Ketcham and took his place on a blanket as the Utah Symphony opened the concert with a robust Wagner piece, "Prelude to Act III of Lohengrin."

People were still standing in line for the buffet when it was time for the 7:30 concert to begin. Apparently, the early birds who got there before the 5:30 buffet had no problem, but those who came later had a 45-minute wait — more opportunity to enjoy the mountains. "All in the name of culture," said one hungry woman.

More than one person complained that the event didn't seem very well organized, since resort officials knew 1,500 buffet tickets had been sold. But when people finally got to eat, they decided it was worth the wait for the barbecued chicken, spare ribs, baked beans, salads, fresh strawberries and carrot cake.

The always excellent Utah Symphony served up some pretty fancy fare itself. After the Wagner came Tchaikovsky's "Symphony No. 4 in F Minor," a varied piece which was interrupted by one of the hazards of playing too close to the parking lot: an uncouth motorcyclist and his roaring machine. Anyone who'd been lulled by the crisp mountain air and scent of pine during the precise pizzicato was surely awakened by the first blast of the finale.

Shostakovich's "Festive Overture" definitely was festive, and the orchestra took us south of the border with Copland's "El Salon Mexico." It began with a lazy, siesta-like tempo and moved to the braying of donkeys, Latin rhythms, and the sound of mariachi bands.

Gershwin's "Strike Up the Band" was an audience favorite, evoking images of a marching band, jazz clarinet
